In seeking to explain the violence that has struck the Middle East and North Africa (MENA) over the past two decades, analysis to date has focused predominantly on ideological and identity-based factors. 1 This report expands this discourse by incorporating approaches adopted from the literature on the political economy of war to examine the conflict economies of Iraq, Libya, Syria and Yemen.

Conflict Economies in the Middle East and North Africa ...

The economic crises that beset the British and French Empires throughout the interwar period, culminating in the disaster of World War II, led directly to a relative growth in the economic power of local elites in the above-mentioned states in the Middle East. Based on a liberal political economy, this power both underpinned an elite-based electoral politics that generally ensured relative moderation in the nationalist movement for total independence for a few decades.
