Stephen King uses roughly the first half of the book to establish some kind of every-day-life-routine for Salem's Lot and its people. He introduces a lot of characters (and by "a lot" I mean about a metric ton); not only the main ones but also supporting characters which don't always play a larger part, but still pop up now and then, and just add to the "this is a small-town community feeling", imo.

King once said that in 'Salem's Lot, he set out to create "a fictional town with enough prosaic reality about it to offset the comic-book menace of a bunch of vampires." He did just that by drawing on our universal fear of outsiders, and nowhere is that fear more recognizable than in our traditional image of the New England small town, where insularity itself becomes a defense against incursion by strangers.
