Instead the attachment shame is about the failure of the relationship. These betrayed partners are asking the exact same question, "What does it say about me?" but instead of it being focused on their choice to stay, the question is being asked about the ending and loss of their relationship.

~~Attachment Shame—Partner Hope~~

SHAME & ATTACHMENT 1. Losing the love of another is an experience that brings shame to the self. This occurs as a result of the loss itself, independent of the perceived reasons for the loss. Thus, a personal history of disrupted attachment(s) is intrinsically shame-filled.

Any time a vital attachment bond fails to develop, the person must address the shame of not having felt authentically known and validated. When he becomes an adult, he must acknowledge and grieve this loss. Grief resolution allows him to release these body-held memories, and in the process, to mourn the loss.
