Many of us are brought up in homes in which we are the only one with a disability. Maybe we haven’t learned to think of ourselves or other people with disabilities as proud individuals. People with disabilities want respect and acceptance. Many people who do not have a disability now will have one in the future.

In today’s video I’ve created a guide to disability language. I’m reasonably active on social media. One of the things I’ve noticed in disability communities is discourse around the language we use to describe disability and difference. It can feel as though it’s best not to say anything for fear of causing offence.

People with learning disabilities often interpret body language and non-verbal communication in understanding simple everyday interactions. It is essential when communicating with someone with a learning disability to give them time to take in what is being said, and to communicate more slowly than you may normally in order to allow them to process what it is that you are communicating.
