Trumpet Bb Cornet Eb Soprano

A difference in sound. The next difference between the trumpet and the cornet is their sounds. Whilst many people think the trumpet and cornet sound the same, they actually make quite different sounds. There are two types of cornet on offer, which both give different sounds. A soprano Eb cornet produces a higher sound than a normal cornet (Bb), and so in order to play full musical range on a cornet, you might occasionally see cornet players swapping between a higher and regular instrument ...

The Bb cornet within the brass band. The Bb cornet is most commonly found in the brass band, where it plays a major part in producing the iconic sounds the brass band is known for, and the principal soprano voice. The cornet is actually the smallest instrument in a brass band, which makes it useful for transportation, and also make it popular with younger players too.

It is possible to play Eb trumpet in a brassband but this requires a lot of care producing the requested sound; in the long run much better using a soprano/Eb cornet. I'm not that fond of the newer Schilkes; I find them more demanding in terms of intonation, air etc but I guess this is personal.

Cornet. Similar to the trumpet and pitched in Bb or Eb, Cornets are popular in both brass and concert bands. Part of the trumpet and flugel horn family, Cornets produce a more mellow sound due to their tightly wrapped tubing and conical bore (bore diameter increases along the instrument). Cornets are the highest pitched instruments in British brass bands but are also sometimes used in concert and wind bands.

The Eb is used mainly as the soprano voice for British brass band literature (and some earlier American band literature). The Bb is used mainly in brass bands and wind bands. There are limited uses for cornets in symphonic work. I'd say the Bb is by far the most popular choice for traditional solo cornet work.

Soprano Cornets are pitched in Eb, a fourth higher than the more common Cornets in Bb. There is usually only one Soprano Cornet in a Brass Band as opposed to ten in Bb. It is regularly used as a solo instrument both in today's test pieces and in solo work. Today's instruments are much larger than the instruments of 20 years ago, with bigger bore sizes and bell diameters.
