If what you mean to say is “You ARE welcome” in response to someone saying “thank you, it’s “You’re welcome. But if you are saying that someone’s welcome is assured — say you’re writing a brochure for a resort —then it is “Your [warm] welcome is assured at Island Paradise, no matter what the time of year.”

~~Which one is correct: “Your welcome...” or “You're welcome ...~~

This might seem complicated, but remember: when in doubt, you can always just smile politely and say “you’re welcome”

. 1. My pleasure. This is probably the most formal and gracious option on the list. You are telling the other person that whatever favour you’ve just done for them, you truly enjoyed it and perhaps gained some benefit from it.

~~10 amazing ways to say you're welcome~~

Here are a few more ways to say “You’re welcome” in English. You got it; Don’t mention it; No worries; Not a problem; My pleasure; It was nothing; I’m happy to help; Not at all; Sure; Anytime; All of these phrases mean that the person was happy to help you and that you shouldn’t worry about thanking them. In other words, they mean “You’re welcome!”

~~Prepositions after "welcome": "welcome to" or "welcome in"?~~

When you do a favor, and someone says “thank you,” the automatic response is “you’re welcome.” It’s a basic rule of politeness, and it signals that you accept the expression of gratitude — or that you were happy to help. But according to one leading psychologist, this isn’t the best choice of words.
